

Drought and Utah Lake
By Mrs. Laureen Cedarstrom
As told to Russell Felt

In 1935 at the peak of the great drought, Utah Lake dried completely up. My husband Roger and I were able to drive our car completely across the Lake to Provo from Pelican Point.

Roger and Laureen lived at Pelican Point. Roger and his brother ran the calcite mine out there. That stuff was used to harden eggshells. It was fed to the chickens.

It was said that during this drought, John Hutchings found many objects out there at that time. Someone told me John took scouts out there to search the area. Without Deer Creek Dam the lake shore line moved according to winter storms.

Above Pelican Point along the Lake Bonneville shoreline there was a shallow cave with Paintings on the walls. I never saw it but understood it was destroyed some many years ago.
